Tuesday, September 30, 2011 On 28th September, Los Angeles County DA continued its investigation of National Security Agency whistleblower Edward Snowden in a local court. Here is Tim Weiner's account of events in the Guardian, and the transcript of the hearing. See also Glenn Greenwald's account of the events (in English) here. Note that the Guardian's story on the event cites no evidence for the claim that the prosecution will allege that "Snowden snooped on a specific US company." L.A. District Attorney Jackie Lacey—who is also a Republican—is known for taking a hard line with alleged white-collar criminals, sometimes even reaching into their pockets. The case thus raises questions about how vigilant U.S. prosecutors will be in approaching individuals who have breached national security when they might be spilling information about government abuses. At the hearing yesterday, assistant district attorney Dennis Riordan argued that Snowden's disclosures harmed national security, and also exposed the Los Angeles office to liability. He noted that the Leopold case had ended in a civil compromise, that Lacey had personally conducted the investigation, and that the case involved issues of national security. Riordan also asked Judge William Horsley to issue an order of protection against the defendant. "There's a very real threat to the orderly conduct of the trial, not only if he tries to influence witnesses and others involved in the case, but by directly contacting witnesses," Riordan said, referencing the fact that Snowden is a computer expert who might be able to hack into various systems. Snowden had already violated two orders of protection issued by the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, and the court had issued an ex parte order of protection. In defense, Snowden attorney Ben Wizner pointed out that the concern was unsubstantiated and that there was no suggestion that Snowden was in L.A., or even in the U.S. Wizner also asked the court to order that prosecutors provide the defense with copies of all prosecution witnesses, as well as of all of Snowden's communications with news outlets. As part of their investigation, prosecutors have already sought, and obtained, access to the defendant's communications with journalists, he said. During his comments, Riordan made it clear that he thought Snowden had violated the terms of an oath he took during the investigation. "He had sworn an oath to uphold the law, not to subvert it," Riordan said. "I think he
